“This year we were pleased to support organizations that are developing and implementing programs to address physician burnout, as this issue continues to be a growing concern within the medical community,” said Julie Burns, president of the NORCAL Group Foundation. “We’re also delighted to be able to assist several groups providing health care services to low-income and underserved members of the community, and we are impressed with the work that they’re doing.”

The NORCAL Group Foundation has supported 15 programs in five states since its inception, and is working continually to expand its reach. The next grant cycle opens March 1. Interested applicants should visit norcalgroupfoundation.org for information and application requirements.
